Proposed Creative Europe project – to which project are you looking for partners?

Sector or field	Performing arts
Description or summary of the proposed project	ULYSSEY What if the acts of the Gods are mere whims of entities with superior access to information and technology?
	We propose a reinterpretation of the classical work The Odyssey as a contemporary theatre piece, adopting a desacralizing lens to reconnect it with pressing societal challenges, such as increasing inequality and undemocratic sources of power.
	The Gods are described in Homer's tradition as temperamental, biased, and omnipotent beings. But what if the Gods were no more than human beings with superior access to information and technology? If "divine" signifies the ability to perform acts beyond the reach of ordinary beings, shouldn't the possibilities available to certain individuals today be viewed as unnatural? This point of view unveils the origins of increasing power imbalances rooted in differentiated access to technology and information, exacerbated with the advent of Artificial Intelligence.

Let us consider today's Tech Giants. Despite their immense power, these non-institutionalized sources of modern authority remain entirely unaccountable. Just like Homer's Gods, they are free to act as magnanimous or vindictive, generous or selfish, as they wish, treating humans as disposable objects according to their goals, regardless of the values shared by most of society. Our goal is to create a piece that exposes these 'God-like' powers and forces us to question how we, as a society, should address them. This reflection finds fertile ground in a desacralized The Odyssey, which we wish to reconstruct from the perspective of three female characters: Circe, Calypso, and Penelope. The contrast between the eternal Gods and the mortal humans is also a crosscutting theme in Homer's work. Through a desacralized perspective, we aim to explore both the perennial and the ephemeral as elements of the human experience: We propose to use already existing man-made or natural landscapes as organic scenarios for the play. This is in full coherence with using a poem written c. 8th century BC for understanding modern challenges. We wish to highlight the intertemporal dimension of human existence (rooted in the past, living in present, and considering the future), and to reject a disposability culture that misinterprets old as obsolete. We propose sharing food and drink with the audience as an integral part of the play, embodying The Odyssey's omnipresent praise of hospitality and the celebration of transient sensual pleasures. These experiences are inherently fleeting, and yet universally shared. Fatias de Cá. Partners currently involved in the project
